How Parents Can Teach Responsibility

- * Help your children learn to do things for themselves. When children have a feeling of independence, they have more confidence to try new things and expand their capabilities.
- * Allow your children to take care of themselves as much as possible. Let them choose which clothes to wear each morning, and make other basic decisions about their own lives.
- * Teach your children to respect others. The best way to teach respect for others is by example. If you respect other people, regardless of who they are or where they come from, your children will follow in your footsteps.

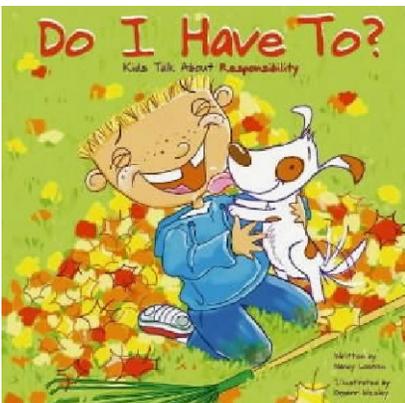

Send The Right Messages

We send messages about responsibility every day. Here are some tips on the kinds of messages to send:

- * Praise efforts to become responsible. This is the most important thing you can do. It focuses your child's attention on the right issues.
- * Praise improvement. This emphasizes that your child is on the right track, providing motivation for responsible behavior in the future.
- * Don't help too much. If you give your children too much help, they can't take credit for what goes right. They may begin to believe that you don't think they can be responsible.

Do I Have To?: Kids Talk About Responsibility

by Nancy Loewen

Another Nancy Loewen book that immediately engages children from 6-8. These books make great read to aloud whether at bedtime or at school. The illustrations are whimsical, the situations both relevant and funny. Read all of them!
